Although both companies will track your cargo and move it through the supply chain, an NVOCC is also acting as a carrier and has more responsibility for your cargo. (https://globalforwarding.com/blog/freight-forwarder-vs-nvocc); A Non-Vessel Operating Common Carrier (NVOCC) is an ocean carrier that transports goods under its own House Bill of Lading, or equivalent documentation, without operating ocean transportation vessels. Rather, an NVOCC leases space from another ocean carrier, or Vessel Operating Common Carrier (VOCC), that they sell to their own customers. Maintenance of machineries has to be carried out regularly. Considering the ships situation, various tools, parts and materials are required to be always available onboard. Clear and good understanding of tools, parts and materials are beneficial to engineers for proper upkeep and inventory of tools.

8.1 Maintenance Tools

8.1.1 Hand Tools

a. Hand Spanner/Wrenches

There are different types of hand spanner and wrenches that are available in the work shop which could be selected depending on the type and condition of maintenance work to be done.

Example usage of hand spanner and wrenches:

i. Adjustable wrench is used as easy tool for undetermined size of bolt and nut when immediate tightening is required.
ii. Adjustable pipe wrench is suitable for fastening/loosening small sizes threaded pipes and damage head bolt in an awkward position.
ii. Slogging spanner is used for loosening and tightening big sizes of bolts using hammer.
iv. Instead of adjustable pipe wrench, hook spanner is used for threaded cap connection with teeth to avoid damaging the cap.
v. Offset spanners are used when working in an awkward position jobs.
vi. Square drive wrench is specially used for square bolts or handle.
vii. Torque wrenches are used for a specified torque controlled tightening of bolts and nuts.

{The tide is stemmed, alternately the wind, if it has stronger influence. In case the two are from slightly different directions, as shown, the weather anchor is let go with engines going dead slow ahead. The engines may be stopped as required, maintaining the headway. The anchor cable is continuously paid up to say 9 shackles (the total of the final shackle lengths). The vessel will tend to stop due to the springing back or slackening of cable. This will be also due wind and tide which were stemmed. Now, the lee anchor is let go and the cable paid out. The slack on the weather anchor cable is picked up as the vessel drops astern. The vessel may need astern propulsion to move astern. Once the vessel has reached the position, (half way between i.e. 4.5 shackles on each cable) the lee anchor becomes the riding cable. The cargo, the quantity and the weight inside the container are not known or verified by the shipping line (although the SOLAS VGM may be proof of the weight) because they are not involved in the packing of the container.. Therefore the shipping line needs some protection against potential claims relating to shortage etc, so they clause the bill of lading with Said To Contain..

These fish have certain distinctive features that make them easily identifiable. First, their bodies are relatively flat. The line from the dorsal area to the front of the fish descends very rapidly giving the face a flattened appearance, especially when viewed in profile. Their color varies widely from species to species, mainly depending on water type and environment. In brackish waters, for example, the fish tend to be darker, with shades of blacks and grays to help them blend in with the environment. Some fish, in other areas, even have a bright red appearance, showing how diverse members of the family can be. ship design[1] (=design) (n) (nav arch) The ship design process may be broken down broadly into two stages: Conceptual and/or preliminary design and detailed or tender or contract design. The preliminary design process will normally take the form of a techno-economic appraisal, using a fundamental engineering economy approach. The ship owner's operational requirements need to be established during preliminary designing, which then allows the development of a basic specification such as deadweight, speed, range, capacity, stability, and freeboard.

stability change (=change in stability) (n) (stabil, nav arch) promjena stabiliteta broda: The metacentric height of the ship changes due to flooding. This can be explained by the general expression of metacentric height: GM = KB + BM - KG. The explanation of reduction in stability can be done in two ways, which is exactly what we will study in this article, but at a later stage. For now, it should suffice to understand that when a ship is flooded, it results in a change of KB and BM values. The KB rises due to flooding, and it may rise further due to change in the ship's trim. However, there is a significant reduction in BM, which is a function of the area moment of the ship's water plane. Why? We will look into that when we study the Lost Buoyancy Analysis. https://www.marineinsight.com/naval-architecture/ship-stability-damaged-stability-ships/ {GM = metacentric height; KB = Centre of Buoyancy; BM = Metacentric Radius = distance from the keel to the metacentre = distance from the vessels center buoyancy to the keel; KG = Centre of Gravity} switch bill of lading (=SBL) (n) (logist, mar law) SEE original Bill of Lading

Corrections or changes to an original bill of lading calls for issuing another set with the correct details on it by way of a switch bill of lading. While some very minor alterations are endorsed on the original bill of lading itself, there may be other changes that require the issuance of a fresh set. These include changes to the port of discharge, the buyer or receiver, the description of goods to include its full details or certain specifications, or the trading terms. Any of these pre-agreed points may have changed while the goods are in transit. When any of these cases occur a fress bill of lading is issued and therefore called a switch bill of lading.

However, since the level of luxury on larger yachts has seen an increasing trend, the use of the word yacht to mean any sailing vessel has been diminishing and is more and more limited to racing yachts or cruising yachts. Yacht lengths generally start at 32-35 feet (10-11 m) and go up to hundreds of feet. A mega yacht generally refers to any yacht (sail or power) above 100 ft (34 m) and a super yacht generally refers to any yacht over 200 ft (70 m).
